Re: Retransmission Consent Reform, Digital Transition Quiet Period Proposal, Docket Nos. 99-363, 07-198, 07-148

The Federal Communications Commission ("Commission") should not allow retransmission consent disputes to undermine the digital transition in February 2009. Small and mid-sized cable providers have requested that the Commission adopt a retransmission consent "quiet period" that would maintain the status quo during the fragile period surrounding the digital transition.¹ We agree. Adopting a quiet period for all pay TV providers would ensure that commercial disputes do not disrupt service to consumers and add to the confusion surrounding one of the most difficult technical and operational transitions in U.S. television history.² Indeed, failure to adopt a quiet period threatens to undermine the significant ongoing consumer education efforts undertaken by the federal government and private industry. After adopting the quiet period -- which merely shifts potential consumer disruption beyond the digital transition -- the Commission should move forward quickly to reform holistically the retransmission consent process.

Retransmission Consent System is Broken. In recent months, a number of broadcaster/pay TV provider disputes have resulted in public threats and takedowns with consumers losing access to popular programming. In each instance, the central issue has been demands by broadcasters for exponential increases in the size of retransmission consent fees. Indeed, retransmission consent fees have become big business: SNL Kagan projects that retransmission consent fees will reach $1 billion annually by 2010, a remarkable jump from last year's $340 million.³ Nexstar alone has seen retransmission consent fees jump from $2.8 million for all of 2005 to $4.6 million in the first quarter of 2008 alone (or annualized at $18.4 million).⁴ Such astronomical growth in broadcaster fees at the expense of the pay TV industry cannot serve the public interest.

² Id., fn 3 (noting that "Petitioners have no objection to extending the same rules to DBS retransmission consents negotiations, and it would make sense to do so.").

³ Mariach, Robert, "Broadcast's $1 Billion Pot of Gold," BROADCASTING AND CABLE (July 7, 2008) ("$1 Billion Pot of Gold").

⁴ Compare Retransmission Consent and Other Federal Rules Affecting Programmer-Distributor Negotiations, Congressional Research Service, CRS-34 (July 9, 2007) ("CRS Report") to NEXSTAR Broadcasting Group Inc. Earnings Conference Call, FD Wire, 2 (May 7, 2008).

A review of the demands by individual station groups demonstrates how anti-consumer the unchecked broadcaster practices have become. For instance, as noted by the Congressional Research Service, Sinclair recently sought hundreds of dollars in upfront fees per subscriber on top of $1.00 per month fees to access broadcast content. CRS Report, CRS-46. As broadcasters seek to extract higher and higher fees from pay TV providers, it is important to note that broadcasters still use public airwaves obtained for free and charge for content they provide over-the-air at no cost. This is also in stark contrast to how the broadcast industry is evolving on other platforms: broadcast content is increasingly made available to consumers online for free on an episode-by-episode basis, yet pay TV providers are required to pay escalating sums for the same content.

The Digital Transition is at Risk. Going forward, the demands – and the prevalence of disputes – will only increase in the time between now and the February digital transition. The American Cable Association accurately notes that thousands of retransmission consent agreements expire at the end of 2008.⁵ Absent corrective Commission action, consumers will lose access to broadcast programming on pay TV platforms for days, weeks, or months immediately preceding and following the transition. Given the timing of agreements, this is most likely to happen in January 2009, weeks before the final February 2009 transition date. Despite the best efforts of pay TV providers to educate their consumers, commercial disputes resulting in takedowns of programming will be linked to the digital transition by consumers, causing confusion and potentially unnecessary expenditures of money on digital televisions or digital-to-analog converter boxes. The negative effects on a successful transition are being felt already: a few broadcasters have refused to participate – absent increased payment for digital rights – in the satellite industry’s infrastructure efforts to transition over 1400 broadcasters from analog to digital. The Commission should require broadcasters to participate actively in the substantial transition efforts of the pay TV industry by allowing all pay TV providers to retransmit broadcasters’ digital signal in place of their analog signal immediately. The focus of all affected industries should be on minimizing unnecessary disruption of broadcast services.

Digital Transition Quiet Period. We urge the Commission to establish a “quiet period” as proposed by mid-sized and small cable companies, which would preserve the status quo by requiring both broadcasters and pay TV providers to maintain their existing carriage agreements through May 31, 2009. See e.g., Petition at 13-18. This is a common sense and pro-consumer means to separate out digital transition-related disruptions from commercial disputes between broadcasters and pay TV providers. All broadcast stations carried on pay TV platforms today should be available beyond the transition to reduce consumer confusion at this critical time. This temporary bridge would help ensure a successful digital transition and allow both broadcasters and pay TV providers to focus their attention on transition-related issues, such as consumer education. Specifically, the commercial agreements and carriage terms between broadcasters and pay TV providers for analog signals would be transferred to the carriage of broadcasters’ digital signals until such time as a new agreement between the parties can be reached. We hope this consumer protection can be in place in advance of the Wilmington, North Carolina, digital cutover in September, 2008.

Broader Review of Retransmission Consent Rules. The Commission should use this quiet period as an opportunity to revisit its retransmission consent rules and ensure that all pay TV providers and broadcasters have the regulatory tools and protections necessary for the operation of an equitable and fair market. The Congressional Research Service last year noted the reasonableness of a Commission “review of its retransmission consent complaint process.” CRS Report, CRS-66. That review – some of which is ongoing in other fora – should focus on the following key issues:

Eliminate the Forced Bundling and Tying of Programming. The Commission should act swiftly in the wholesale programming proceeding to require broadcasters to offer each programming network on a stand-alone basis.⁶ The opportunity to negotiate each individual broadcast and cable network property separately would help ensure that more equitable deals are reached for both broadcasters and pay TV providers.

Bolster the Good Faith Standard. The Commission should ensure that broadcast misconduct and anti-competitive and anti-consumer conduct is addressed sufficiently within the good faith requirement of the retransmission consent rules. Broadcasters too often view the current rules as providing no substantive check on their conduct in carriage negotiations, which leads to unreasonable price increases. Egregious conduct and demands of broadcasters should be restricted as clear violations of the good faith requirement in the Act. To protect consumers, the Commission should also consider adopting a standstill provision that would prevent the disruption of programming while the Commission reviews the merits of any good faith complaints, and should additionally examine the incorporation of binding arbitration into the retransmission consent process.⁷

Protect Competitive and Small Pay TV Providers. Only the largest cable providers have sufficient scope and penetration to negotiate a potentially fair carriage deal with broadcasters today.⁸ Satellite companies, small cable companies, telephone companies, and cable overbuilders have little leverage to refuse the high fees demanded by broadcasters. Broadcasting & Cable explained recently that “[w]hen retrans[mission consent] fever first erupted several years ago, broadcasters targeted small cable operators, satellite TV and new entrants such as Verizon FiOS with the first wave of deals. These newer companies lacked clout, either nationally or with the heft of concentration in any one local market, so they pay the highest per capita fees.” $1 Billion Pot of Gold . In more recent deals, those disproportionately high fees are only getting larger. The imbalance in what major cable companies like Comcast and Time Warner Cable pay broadcasters compared to all other pay TV providers is striking. The Commission should ensure that retransmission fees do not adversely affect the ability of companies to compete effectively in the video market with dominant cable companies. The Commission should consider allowing all other pay TV providers to opt into the “market” rate agreed to by the broadcaster and incumbent major cable provider.

Investigate Broadcaster Use of Retransmission Consent Fees. It remains unclear how broadcasters use the windfall payments received from pay TV providers. Broadcasters should be required to provide the Commission with clear evidence and documentation that retransmission consent fees are used to increase the amount of locally based content available to communities. Moreover, the current regime creates the perverse incentive for broadcasters to maximize the number of households dependent upon pay TV providers (and corresponding retransmission consent fees) to view broadcaster content by limiting the reach of free over-the-air broadcasts. The different propagation characteristics of digital signals may only exacerbate this issue after the digital transition.

The Commission should take affirmative steps to ensure that the retransmission consent process does not place the digital transition at risk.

Respectfully submitted,
